Are you working in a Community Planning Partnership or with other partners locally?

At NHS Health Scotland, we believe that collaborating with local and national partners is essential for reducing health inequalities.

Our new website is here to help!

We've collected the tools, evidence and resources you need – it's all in one place, ready to use:

- If you are working with others to improve planning, our Health Inequalities Action Framework could be the tool for you.
- Or if you want to better understand your local area needs then have a look at Good Places Better Health or our community health profiles.
- We also offer evidence on health inequalities and actions to take on mitigating welfare reform.

Health inequalities are unfair differences in the health of the population that occur across and between social classes or population groups. In other words, health inequalities mean 'sicker longer, die younger'. Health inequalities are not inevitable – action at national and local levels can prevent, mitigate and undo them.
